You are on a night out with your friends celebrating someone's birthday. You all get chatting to a group of fellas and the craic is f lowing. One of the guys you're talking to offers to buy you a drink and asks what you would like. He says he's a gentleman so you can stay seated, and he'll go get it for you. He comes back with your drink and suggests a toast. He seems eager for you to drink it.

The group decides to move onto a livelier place, where you know there is live music and people will be dancing. On the way there, the guy you're talking to asks if you want to go somewhere else away from the group so you can get to know each other a bit better. You say that you want to continue celebrating your friends birthday with her so politely decline. He tries to persuade you and seems a bit angry, but you arrive to the venue with the live music.

You and your friends are having a good time dancing. The group of fellas are all sat down chatting, but you notice them looking over at you. You brush it of f. They're probably talking about all the girls, not just you. Next thing you know, the guy who bought you a drink, is behind you with his hands on your hips as he tries to dance with you. You feel a bit uncomfortable with this so turn around and create a bit of distance between you but continue to dance together. He continues to try and get close to you.

After a while, you go to sit down, he follows you and puts his hand on your leg and asks if you're OK. You say that you're quite tired and think you might call it a night. The guy asks if you want him to walk you safely to your bus, but you make an excuse to say that your brother is picking you up outside of the venue. You say goodbye to all your friends and leave.

As you walk through town, you feel like you're being followed. You cross the road and look behind you as subtly as you can, you were right. It's the guy that bought you a drink, he's following a bit behind you. You are scared now so begin walking as fast as you can and stick to the most public streets that should be busy with people. You get to your bus just in time and you can see the guy running towards it just as you pull off.
